

Spirituality

Pope Francis greets Astrid Kaptijn, a professor of canon law and president of the Society for the Law of the Eastern Churches, Sept. 19, 2019, during an audience in the Clementine Hall of the Apostolic Palace at the Vatican. (CNS/Vatican Media)

Cindy Wooden

View Author Profile

Catholic News Service

View Author Profile

Join the Conversation

Send your thoughts to Letters to the Editor. Learn more

Vatican City — September 19, 2019

Share on FacebookShare on TwitterEmail to a friendPrint

The search for Christian unity must involve all aspects of the churches' lives, including their different church laws, Pope Francis said.

"Canon law is essential for ecumenical dialogue," the pope told members of the Society for the Law of the Eastern Churches, which is made up mostly of canon lawyers from the Orthodox, Oriental Orthodox and Eastern Catholic churches.

The society held its international congress in Rome Sept. 16-20. Ecumenical Patriarch Bartholomew of Constantinople opened the meeting, and Francis spoke to participants Sept. 19.

The Catholic-Orthodox and Catholic-Oriental Orthodox theological dialogues, the pope said, focus in great part on ecclesiology, the theological understanding of what the church is and how its structure reflects its identity.

Francis said that focus means the dialogues "have a canonical dimension, too, since ecclesiology finds expression in the institutions and the law of the churches. It is clear, therefore, that canon law is not only an aid to ecumenical dialogue, but also an essential dimension."

The formal Catholic-Orthodox dialogue, for example, hopes to discuss ways that the bishop of Rome -- that is, the pope -- could exercise his primacy for the benefit of all in a reunited church. The dialogue members are laying the groundwork for those discussions by looking at what Francis called "the common canonical heritage of the first millennium" when East and West were still in full communion.

While the dialogue benefits from the study of canon law, he said, canon law also can benefit from the ecumenical dialogue by seeing how other churches operate and strive to have their law reflect their Christian identity, faith, spirituality and traditions.

As an example, Francis pointed to his efforts to foster a more "synodal church," one marked by a process of listening to everyone and involving all members of the church in accordance with their specific role.

"When translated into established institutions and procedures of the church," he said, "synodality expresses the ecumenical dimension of canon law," because the synod structure has been part of church governance in the Orthodox and Oriental Orthodox churches for centuries.

Opening the meeting, Bartholomew also focused on Orthodox and Eastern Catholic canon law as field of ecumenism.

While the joint search for Christian unity does not require "the mutual acceptance of the doctrinal and canonical ideas of the interlocutor," he said, it does require meeting "in a spirit of love, mutual respect and understanding, even exploring new and sometimes unprecedented questions and concerns."

The search for Christian unity is a search for truth, the patriarch said. But reaching that truth requires real commitment and "resistance to historic evils such as fanaticism, intolerance and fundamentalism."

In a joint search for truth, Bartholomew said, both sides must set aside pride and be willing to learn and to accept criticism. In the end, he said, ecumenical dialogue is destined "to reunite the common fundamental canonical principles of the Christian faith and spirituality not for its own benefit but for the world."

Advertisement